

1. For lower-level services, an operating system and middleware rely upon different underlying providers. An operating system makes use of the features supported by the hardware to provide the services of its API, whereas middleware utilizes the features supported by an underlying operating system to provide its API services.